Samsung & Starcom Video Effectiveness

What does a video “view” really mean on YouTube and Facebook?

Two platforms. Two very different definitions of a “view”.

01 THE CHALLENGE

Not all video views are equal

Samsung and Starcom were comparing video results across two platforms that counted a “view” in very different ways.

FACEBOOK FEED VIDEO

A view counted after 3 seconds

Muted by default

Watched while scrolling the feed

3 sec

YOUTUBE VIDEO AD

A view counted after 30 seconds

Played with full sound

Chosen and watched with full attention

30 sec

So how should an advertiser compare video results when the experience and the measurement are this different?

Looking behind the headline number

We compared what actually happened before each platform counted a view, instead of treating the numbers as equal.

View definition

How long someone had to watch before a view was counted.

Sound

Whether the ad was heard, or played silently in the feed.

Attention

Whether the viewer chose the video or scrolled past it.

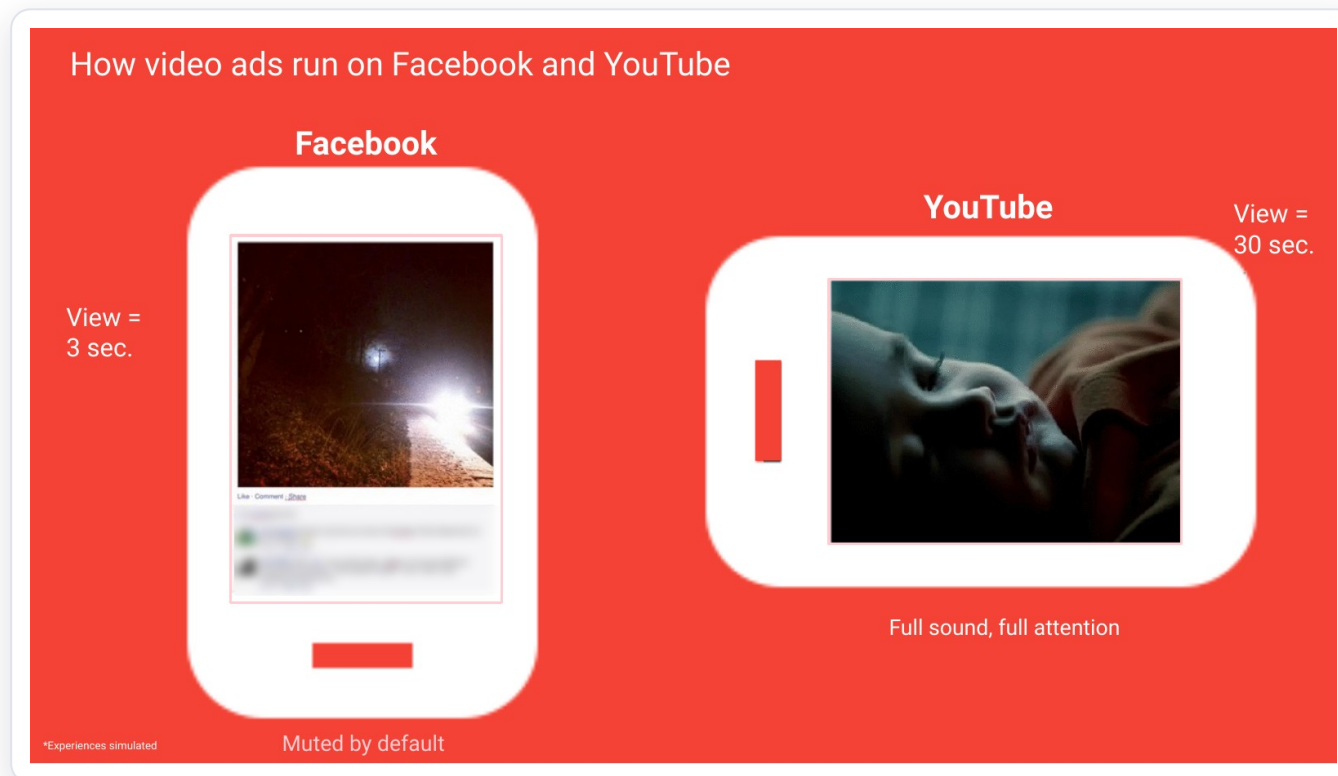

A fairer comparison

Putting platform context behind every metric, so Samsung could judge video by real impact and plan its investment with confidence.

03 THE IDEA IN ONE SLIDE

How video ads run on Facebook and YouTube

The original comparison slide from the work, showing the two viewing experiences side by side.

LEFT

Feed video: muted, scrolled past, counted at 3 seconds.

RIGHT

YouTube: full screen, full sound, counted at 30 seconds.

TAKEAWAY

The same word, “view”, described two very different moments.

From platform detail to better client decisions

MY ROLE

As Samsung's Google lead, I co-developed this video effectiveness comparison and brought it to Samsung and its media agency, Starcom.

It helped both teams read video results in context and connect measurement to where the next video investment should go.

Enterprise client leadership

Agency partnership
